AND EVERYBODY WOULD TURN REPORTER

Four Jewish daily newspapers in New York with a combined circulation of 400,000 copies, are without reporters today. There was no saloon opening in the neighborhood, the usual reason for papers being without reporters.

The men , who belong to Jewish Writers' union, No. 4, went on strike for conditions, which, if granted, would make every reporter in the country immediately want to be a Jewish reporter.

Being a reporter would be almost as soft a job as that of an auto bandit here in Chicago.

Some of the demands are:

A five-hour day.

A minimum wage of $25 a week.

"Copy" to be rejected only after consultation with walking delegate, "Blue pencil" to be eliminated.

All disputes between editors and writers to be referred to the chairman of the office chapel for settlement, and no man to be fired unless the chairman agrees.

Three columns a day to be the maximum required of any reporter.

My, that would be a pipe of a job. The walking delegate would be a popular guy, and every reporter in the office would invite him to "have one," just to keep solid. A reporter would go out and get a "story." It might be a whale of a "story," and good for four columns. The third column would wind up like this:

"Just as Bill the Bat was lift-" ing the swag through the window, Elsie, the banker's beautiful daughter, came into-"

Then the reporter would reafuse to write any more. He would have his three columns in. What Elsie did the world would never know. It would be a great thing for the reader's imagination.
